

MINOR IN DECISION SCIENCE

Andrea Denise D. Ng

Uncertainty is an acquired taste. You learn to appreciate its joys through experiencing its struggles, through taking those blind leaps of faith and praying you make it through relatively unscathed. Along the way, you learn to adjust, to let go, and to simply live. Afterwards, you may find yourself a bit less innocent, but a whole lot more human. And you will be grateful.

Of course, Andi's still working on the letting go part, but it's a learning process. (D. Cheng).

Edward Joseph C. Ofilada

For fifteen years, I could always tell myself that there would be more to follow. That like it or not, after a break that always seemed too short, I would be back in the school where it all began. Sixteen, it turns out, is bittersweet. I'm still struggling to come to terms with the fact that this year will be my last. That it's not over yet, but it will be soon. Someday, I hope to read this from a home that means just as much to me as Ateneo does now. Until then, I know I'll keep coming back.