To my 25-year-old self, if you struggle with adjusting at the outset of your career, remember that in first year you had the same struggle but still overcame it. To my 40-year-old self, if stress gets the best of you, remember that in second and third year, your shortcomings prompted you to do better and you did, by tenfold. To my 60-year-old self, if you feel ugly, recall that in fourth year you felt old yet you always looked good. Sincerely, your 20-year-old self who crammed this write-up.

In the moments of defeat, we become broken. As we try to rebuild ourselves, we become better versions of who we were before. College was full of those experiences. We learn that things don't go as planned, we stutter and we fall short. But we recover, we improve and we learn. As I embark on a new journey down the hill into the real world, I'm ready to face life's challenges head on and unfazed by failure. There is always a silver lining.
