Each day of my life in Ateneo has been fueled by joy from grabbing opportunities that have made me who I am today. From swim trainings to covering games in MOA and ending up in Tokyo for JTA, the busy bee's juggle has been exciting, yet challenging. Although I may seem a bit too headstrong in my endeavors, I draw my strength from the people who have always been there to support me, and more importantly, help me ground myself to only choose the battles that matter to me.

More than just the long nights, failed tests, and missed championship games, my stay in the Ateneo has left me with priceless insights, the most important of which were learning to go beyond my limits, to unceasingly find ways to improve myself and my performance, and to learn how to be comfortable with the uncomfortable; that no matter the circumstance, to continue to trudge on, to work hard, and to trust the process, for nothing worth having comes easy.
