

Nathaniel D. Benedicto

There's this one question I've always struggled with. I try to avoid it whenever possible 'cause I really hate being asked:

"What do you want to be when you grow up?"

I never had an answer. Though surprisingly, other people always knew theirs, and this was probably due to my own lack of direction and foresight in life. However, If there's one thing I learned in college... I guess it's my answer to this question:

"Happy."

Danielle D. Buenaventura

"Journeying with her in the Ateneo, I can affirm that Dana's greatest strength is her ability to empathize with people. Always willing to put herself out there to defend the weak and abused. Be the voice of the voiceless. Always willing to show kindness to everyone who needs it, even if sometimes it leads her to forego her own needs. But this ability that she has that puts others first, this superpower, makes her the perfect Atenean, the very definition of a woman for others." (J. Santos)