“Two species are endemic to the Philippines, and at least one of them—found in the mountains of Cordillera—is endangered. Their flowers bloom late in the summer but each bud opens at its own pace. At full-bloom, they resemble trumpets and feature white and yellow in various parts of their flowers. Though the plants may appear dainty, the pleasant smell is known to intoxicate unwitting victims. If spotted, approach with caution; its many benefits can only be harnessed with proper care.” (A. Amor)
