I was 13 when I first heard of Ateneo during a volleyball match I happened to watch on TV. I set my gaze upon six fearless women in blue and white jerseys who were adamant to win the bout. Setting foot in the Ateneo required fearlessness. Every day was a battle against unwanted detours, unmet expectations, and self-doubt. But that's what makes Ateneo special. They breed warriors in adversity. As I leave the Ateneo, I am no longer a mere spectator of some rivalry match. I became a warrior myself.

I remember meeting Kev back in freshman year during OrSem as my blockmate. He was that buff, tall guy that his peers who don't know him would get intimidated of, and I was one of them. Since then, we've been through our highs and lows together and individually, and yet we remain to be each other's best friend even after 4 years. Needless to say, I'm really proud to have seen him grow as a mature gentleman that he is now, one who is ready to make his own impact in the real world. (R. Alba)
