

MINOR IN KOREAN STUDIES

Steven Tan

This was not supposed to happen. When I was a kid poised to begin studying in grade school, I hoped to get into Ateneo, but Ateneo turned out to be the only school I was not accepted in. 12 years later, the boards at the Blue Eagle Gym read “waitlisted” beside my name. But here I am. I had highs and lows, I rose and I fell, I had moments of happiness and battles with depression, and somehow I’m still standing. After 17 years, I am true, I am blue, all thanks to you. All for your greater glory.

If you are reading this at the moment, then it must mean that you graduated. Congratulations. Who would have thought that you would end up in one of most prestigious schools in the country and still graduate? One might think that it must have taken a lot of educational guesses, help from heart-warming groups of friends, and considerate professors. Chances are, they would probably be right. Well, regardless of what you have gone through, college has come to an end. A new life’s waiting ahead.
