

MINOR IN FINANCE

Jeremy Mark T. Chan

I knew from the moment I met Jeremy that he was the type of person who would surprise me. He seems stupid — well, sometimes he is — but that's not all there is to him. He's the type of guy who buys you candy when you're sad, lines up for you at 7AM to register your classes, and flashes his belly in JSEC to cheer you up. He has always been one to disregard the usual, making most people think less of him, but it's exactly why I know he's something else. I'm glad he kept saying hi. (G. De Guzman)

Four years ago, I thought that by the time I graduated college I would have fixed my life. But here I stand, end of senior year, with no fixed life. Sad. These four years was a ride, though. Four years of stress and sleepless nights (bless, 40 thesis statements), and questioning whether I'm good enough. Four years of growth, sabaw laughter, adventures in another country, and hours and hours of storytelling in JSEC. Four years that I'll treasure wherever I end up in the future. Thanks, Ateneo.
