

Edward Joseph C. Ofilada

For fifteen years, I could always tell myself that there would be more to follow. That like it or not, after a break that always seemed too short, I would be back in the school where it all began. Sixteen, it turns out, is bittersweet. I'm still struggling to come to terms with the fact that this year will be my last. That it's not over yet, but it will be soon. Someday, I hope to read this from a home that means just as much to me as Ateneo does now. Until then, I know I'll keep coming back.

Juan Virgilio Nathaniel M. Pineda

A man whose compass always points towards the right direction. He would brave any storm to get to where he wants to be with both of his feet planted to what is right. He would light up a flame at the smallest injustice, despite all the winds that go against him. Like any other explorer, he will do great things equipped with his strong will and kind heart no matter where he goes. But what makes him one of the few great ones is that he will always find his way back home. (A. Mortel)
