Procrastination, panic, hope, and many hours of pure and unadulterated hard work. These are the four phases of my not-so-seldom all-nighters, and what being an Atenean means to me: to procrastinate on doing the things I love with the people who matter most, to panic when things aren't right and when humanity is compromised, to hope for the bright future that we all are destined for, and to work for both what we need and what we desire. For imbining these in me, Ateneo, I am forever grateful.

I am clueless about how to make a write-up at this point, stuck in between the last two semesters of my college life. But I can definitely say that Ateneo is where I was able to push myself beyond my limits and where I met the best people in my life. I know that different threads of memories in Ateneo will last so much easier than I expect them to, and they will hopefully all make sense in the end.
