Life at its finest comes in the little moments (often past 12MN) — by the ocean, on top of a building, with the windows down in the back seat of a car — moments of pure happiness and utter clarity, where we take a deep breath and realize that our worries are actually a lot smaller than we think, and that we're part of a universe much larger than we and our every day. These moments of perspective are what make me grateful for everything, and why I wouldn't have gone through college any other way.

I have always been an optimistic person, taking things lightly and maintaining a positive outlook on life. I do all things for myself, and even more for my family. But having met passionate people and noble professors, I realize there's a lot more in this world to fight for beyond myself and my family. Being aware of today's social realities has inspired me to go beyond myself, to do more, and to be more. And for this, I am forever grateful.
