I'll never not be proud to say I've been broken, and many times at that. There's this inexplicable beauty in all the creases and cracks of life. For it is through these creases that we shatter ourselves to make way for our lights to shine, and at the same time make way for the lights of others to illuminate ours. If there's one thing that Ateneo has taught me, it's precisely that — the beauty of life is only ever manifested through the intertwining of each other's own versions of brokenness.
