“The stars were shining.’ Never again will this happiness return just this way. [Graduation] both fulfills and lacerates me.” (Roland Barthes, sort of)

Here’s to everyone: the ones who stay, the ones who leave, the ones who’ll stay until just a bit later, when the morning comes, and the ones who leave to come back and never have to leave again. Cheers, you. We’ll never be this young again.

P.S. Longer writeup later (when I finally leave school. Ah, the double major life).

The journey in Ateneo was definitely one riddled with endless breakdowns and moments of vulnerability. We learned to settle for the D’s and celebrate the unexpected B’s, especially with extra-curriculars eating all our time. Despite this, we had the strength to push through and, thank God, we finally made it. More than academics, Ateneo has taught me to proceed with passion, always, and that is exactly what I intend to do. I can’t be happier to say that I have learned so much. Thank you, Ateneo.
